

FOURTH SUNDAY OF EASTER

FROM: DOCAT

The Common Good, Personhood, Solidarity, Subsidiarity The Principles of the Church's Social Teaching

92. What are the limits to the joint use of goods?

Someone who owns private property owns it so that it might be used jointly. Here one must think not only of one's fellowmen who are alive right now but also of future generations. This is the reason for the principle of sustainability. To conduct sustainable economic activity means that society must not use up more resources that it can somehow replace or regenerate.

Therefore, in using a resource one must keep in mind not only one's own advantage but also the welfare of all people, in other words, the common good. The property owner has the right to use his goods productively or else to make them available to someone who can make use of them productively, i.e., to make something new that serves all.

93. What goods do people need in order to be productive?

Today the duty to make property useful and productive applies not only to land and capital but also increasingly to technical knowledge, in other words, to intellectual property. In fact, the prosperity of the industrial nations is based more and more on this kind of property, whereas the ownership of land and raw materials is becoming increasingly less important for prosperity (John Paul II, CA 32). One example is access to high-yield and special seeds, which is in danger of being controlled by large corporations. Without a universal right of access to these goods, the common good cannot be achieved. The global common good implies that a share of innovations is made possible for people in poorer nations as well.

'VOCATION SEEDS'

This is World Day of Prayer for Vocations. The world needs leaders with courage and integrity. The Church needs good leaders as well, leaders who unselfishly care for the needs of God's people and minister to them. If you feel God is calling you to priesthood, religious life or diaconate, call
